Christopher Kelley, University of Arkansas School of Law

Internationalizing the U.S. Law School Classroom: Lessons Learned from Teaching Transnationally

Professor Kelley has remotely taught internationally every semester for more than a decade. He started with point-to-point teaching for small groups using Skype. He now simultaneously teaches students in multiple locations using one of several platforms. And some of his course enrollments have exceeded 100 students.

When he teaches remotely, Professor Kelley most frequently teaches legal writing in English. When he teaches in person, he usually teaches negotiation. These two courses have been the mainstay of his international teaching. They also provided the foundation for his transnational courses. Through teaching them, Professor Kelley learned the virtues of starting simply and innovating gently, taking the time to build relationships along the way.
